Not illustrated. 1846 Excerpt: ...the traveling very fatiguing, and obliged the party to undergo at least two, and sometimes three, journeys with their loads. On the boats landing on a floepiece, Parry and Ross generally walked on ahead to select the easiest road for the boats to follow; the sledges came after them, by which the snow was trodden down, and made easier for the boats. What follows is too interesting to be omitted. As soon as we arrived at the other end of the floe, or came to any difficult place, we mounted one of the highest hommocs of ice near at hand (many of which were from fifteen to twenty-five feet above the sea), in order to obtain a better view around us; and nothing could well exceed the dreariness which such a view presented. The eye wearied itself in vain to find an object but ice and sky to rest upon; and even the latter was often hidden from our view by the dense and dismal fogs which so generally prevailed. For want of variety, the most trifling circumstance engaged a more than ordinary share of our attention; a passing gull, a mass of ice of unusual form, became objects which our situation and circumstances magnified into ridiculous importance; and we have since often smiled to remember the eager interest with which we regarded many insignificant occurrences. It may well be imagined, then, how cheering it was to turn from this scene of inanimate desolation to our two little boats in the distance, to see the moving figures of our men winding with their sledges among the hommocs, and to hear once more the sound of human voices breaking the stillness of this we had killed in the course of the last week; and this was a luxury which persons thus situated could perhaps alone duly appreciate. We had seen
