Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: ...the subsequent hour, grounded on long experience of the sensations of heat corresponding to different indications of the instrument, 9 0 The radiant thermometer was a small and extremely delicate thermometer by Crichton--(one of the four used by Sir William Herschel in his experiments on solar heat,)--closely wrapped in black crape, and suspended about two inches over the centre of a highly polished metallic mirror, 19 inches in diameter, and 20 feet focal length, laid horizontally, face upwards. The night proved unfavorable for the observation³ and the day following the sun interfered and nullified the results. On the whole, this is little to be regretted, the nature of the observation being such as to lead to no definite conclusion. I should observe, that there is no advantage in the usual form of parabolic reflector of silvered copper used in this experiment, nor need any regard be paid to placing the thermometer in or near the focus. It is sufficient if the polished surface subtend an angle of nearly 180 degrees at the thermometer. An extensive reflecting surface of mercury, from its great brilliancy and easy extempore preparation, would, no doubt, answer extremely well. After all, the Whole terrestrial radiation can be got rid of by no contrivance, nor can the fraction remaining be (even approximately) estimated by any method I am acquainted with. 13 0 Sky dull, though clear of all visible cloud; none on the mountain. Definition of stars in the twenty feet reflector good. 14 0 Clouding suddenly from the west, by a vast sheet of dense cloud, which has just attained the zenith, and is sharply terminated: as it advances, a gentle west wind begins to stir. No shooting stars noticed to-night. 15 10 Pitchy cloud obscuring every part of the sky. A perfect cal...
